One of the earliest methods is the time-linearized harmonic frequency domain methods which have been widely used for turbomachinery aeromechanical applications [9, 10]. In these methods the unsteady flow equation is considered as one steady equation and one perturbation equation. The unsteady perturbation of the flow solution is represented in a Fourier series. The validity of these methods is ...

Frequency domain methods. Image enhancement in the frequency domain is straightforward. We simply compute the Fourier transform of the image to be enhanced, multiply the result by a filter (rather than convolve in the spatial domain), and take the inverse transform to produce the enhanced image.
